Victims:

Palestinian refugee Mohamed Kheir AlSarhan, a resident of Yarmouk Camp, south of Syria died under torture in Syrian government jails. He was kidnapped in 2012.

The casualty was identified in a set of pictures leaked by the so-called Caesar breakaway.

AGPS documented the death of 556 Palestinian refugees under torture in Syrian dungeons, where 1,690 others have also been enduring mysterious fates.

Latest Developments

Five years have passed by since 36 Palestinian refugees, among them 18 members of the Ghazi family, were massacred in Zamalka and seven others in Mudhamiyat AlSham on August 21, 2013, in a wild offensive launched on the territory using chemical weapons.

Activists said that over recent days Syrian government forces ravaged the Zamalka graveyard, where the victims of the 2013 massacre have been buried. The activists said the dead bodies are likely to have been transferred to an unknown location.

Sources affiliated with the Syrian opposition said the measure makes part of the government's attempts to cover up its involvement in the massacre. Abduction sweeps have also been launched by the government forces in the area.

Figures released following the massacre estimated that over 1,450 persons were killed. Data by the Syrian Network for Human Rights indicated that the death toll reached 1,127 victims, among them 107 children and dozens of women.

In another development, Syria's Ministry of Education and Higher Education reportedly agreed to work out the situation of Yarmouk residents who dropped out of school due to the tough blockade imposed on the camp.

A letter issued by the Director-General of the General Commission for Arab Palestine Refugees, Ali Mustafa, said the Minister of Higher Education formally approved to settle the files of Yarmouk students.

Residents of Yarmouk Camp had long been grappling with a tough siege enforced by the Syrian government forces and their war partners, blocking civilians' and students' access out of and into the area.

Meanwhile, Khayra Ummah Association, in partnership with Tullabi Association, handed over clothing coupons, contributed by LC WAIKIKI and worth 50 Turkish Pounds, to Palestinian students taking refuge in Reyhanli and Antakya, south of Turkey.

Students sheltered in Osmaniye, Adana, Kilis, Gaziantep, Sanliurfa, and Nizip will benefit from the move, sponsored by the International Islamic Charity Organization.

Unofficial data indicates that 8,000 Palestinian refugees from Syria have sought shelter in Turkey.
